Market Outlook

The Federal Reserve delivered a hawkish rate cut in December 2024, signaling that 2025 would likely see only 50 basis points of rate reductions, lower than the previously expected 100 basis points. This announcement pushed the U.S. Treasury bond yield to 4.6%, while the DXY index climbed to 108. The elevated expectations for U.S. Fed rates and Treasury yields continued to influence domestic monetary conditions. Bank Indonesia (BI) held its BI Rate steady at 6.00% for the third consecutive month. In preparation for 2025, BI and the Ministry of Finance scheduled a meeting to finalize bond issuance targets and the monetary framework. While details are still forthcoming, BI announced plans to purchase government bonds on the secondary market, with the potential total amount reaching Rp 150 trillion. By mid-December, BI had already purchased Rp 113 trillion worth of government bonds, including in the secondary market. Retail investors were the second-largest net buyers at Rp 104 trillion, followed by insurance and pension funds at Rp 98 trillion. Conversely, banks recorded a net sell of Rp 44 trillion throughout 2024. Given the current high yields on Indonesian government bonds (IndoGB) exceeding 7%, we view this as an opportune moment for investors to accumulate bonds. As demonstrated in 2024, market narratives can shift rapidly, and the outlook for 2025 could bring significant changes.
